HISTORIA

Goya had presented a first version of the sketches for the four pendentives of the cupola Regina Martyrum to the Building Committee of the Metropolitan Chapter of Zaragoza, but these were rejected on 10 March 1781. The second versions he submitted were accepted on 17 April, and Goya proceeded to paint the corresponding pendentive frescos, which represent allegories of four of the virtues: Faith, Patience, and Charity.

ANÁLISIS ARTÍSTICO

The representation of four virtues - two of the three so-called theological virtues, Faith and Charity; one of the cardinal virtues, Fortitude, and Patience) depict female figures dressed in vast mantles and seated on clouds. They are accompanied by the different attributes that identify them. The personifications are based on the iconography of the repertoire of allegories described in Cesare Ripa's Iconologia, a book containing many illustrations published in Europe from the end of the 16th century. Faith is depicted as a figure dressed all in white, carrying a chalice and the Sacrament in her right hand and a cross in her left. The veil which covers her head is particularly well executed.

There are clear similarities between this and the representation of the same virtue by Tiépolo which decorates the ceiling of the Throne Room of the Royal Palace in Madrid.

The Allegory of Faith is located on the north-east side of the cupola.
