HISTORIA

For the history of the whole series, see Wild Boar Hunt.

Around 1856 or 1857, this piece was moved from the Royal Tapestry Factory of Santa Bárbara to the Royal Palace in Madrid, and from there it became part of the collection of the Prado Museum in 1870 (still with the attribution to Ramón Bayeu). There it underwent some major changes at the hands of the restorer Jerónimo Seisdedos. It was in temporary storage at the Ministry of Education and Science from 1933 to 1989. Today it is back at the Prado Museum once more.

ANÁLISIS ARTÍSTICO

The hunter is accompanied by a dog lying at his feet. Two more hunters are talking behind him, and a there is a grove of trees in the background. We do not know what the rest of the canvas looked like but the description that Goya himself made of the cartoon leads us to believe that it must have been largely as it is today, since he did not mention any additional elements. Despite this, on the tapestry the heads of two dogs sniffing the ground have been added, along with a tree behind them, which coincide in their composition with the right-hand section of another cartoon, Hunter and his Dogs, which is also a corner-piece made for the same royal dining hall. There exists a preparatory drawing for the hunter who is loading his shotgun, in which he is joined by another figure who appears in the cartoon Hunter with Dogs, which suggests that Goya made these studies from life and later included them in the two compositions.

CONSERVACIÓN

The poor state of conservation of the painting led the restorer at the Prado Museum, Jerónimo Seisdedos, to remove the band on the right-hand side of the canvas and to extend the left-hand side using a fragment taken from another cartoon, erroneously attributed to José del Castillo but actually by Matías Téllez. The result of splicing the two cartoons together is therefore a hybrid, in which only the right-hand half is the work of Goya.
